The transition from the comparative to the positive sense in ON probably originated in such expressions as koma or ganga nær 'to come or go nearer' (to a person or place), which readily passes into the sense of going absolutely 'close' or 'near' The positive sense having thus attached itself to the word, nær could be employed with other verbs than those of motion, as standa or vera (to be) A similar development has taken place in MDu naer near (whence mod Du. naar, to, for, after, etc) Even in English some difference is felt in the sense of near according as it goes with a verb of motion or not, and in predicative use after the verb to be (expressed or implied) the adverbial sense tends to pass into a purely adjectival one

ON nær (like OE néar) might be used either absolutely or governing a noun in the dative case. Both usages were adopted in ME, and a further construction introduced by the use of to before the noun. When the noun directly depends on near, this acquires practically the force of a preposition, but differs from real prepositions in having comparative and superlative forms]

[A Common Teutonic word, of which the normal representative in OE is the form níed (nýd, néd) = OFris. nêd, nâth, OS nôd (MDu. noot-, noet, Du nood), OHG nôt (MHG. nôt, G. noth, not), ON. nauð, neyð (Sw. and Da nod), Goth. nauþs, fem. i-stem —OTeut. nauðī-, nauþi- related to OPruss. nautī-n need

Both in form and gender, however, the word exhibits curious variations in OE The forms níed, nýd, néd would be normal as representatives of a fem i-stem, but in cases where the gender can be distinguished they usually appear as neuters A form without umlaut also occurs (néad cf the ON nauð), which appears to have been feminine The very common form néod, which is distinctly fem, is difficult to account for, if not an independent ablaut-variant, its vowel has probably been influenced by the frequent word néod desire, earnestness, pleasure, etc.]

-ness, suffix, representing OE -nes(s), -nis(s), -nys(s), fem. (inflected, and later also in nom., -nesse, etc.) = OFris. -nesse, -nisse, OS. -nesse, -nessi, -nassi, -nussi (also -nassea, -nussea; MDu. -nesse, -nisse, Du -nis), OHG. -nessi, -nassi, -nissi (also -nissa; MHG. -nisse, G. -nis), Goth. -nassus; the -n is originally part of the stem, the real suffix being -assus, formed from weak verbs in -atjan. The variations in the vowel of the West Germanic forms have not been satisfactorily explained

In middle and early modern English the initial of the suffix is occasionally omitted when preceded by another n, as in brownesse brownness, cleanesse cleanness, keenesse keenness, meanesse meanness, etc (cf note to Finesse).

2. In OE. -nes is the suffix most usually attached to adjectives and past participles to form substantives expressing a state or condition, as biternes, deorcnes, heardnes, ðbolgennes, forþryccednes, etc. A large number of these survive in middle and modern English, and new formations of the same type have been continually made in all periods of the language, it being possible to add the suffix to any adjective or participle, whatever its form or origin may be Formations from compound adjectives are also common, as selfconceitedness, kindheartedness, square-toedness, watertightness, tonguetiedness, etc, and even from adjectival phrases, such as used-upness, get-at-ableness, up-to-dateness, à-la-modeness, little-boyishness, few of the latter, however, are in established or serious use, and most of them are of recent introduction. This is also the case with formations on pronouns, adverbs, etc., as I-ness, me-ness, whatness; whyness, withoutness, nowness, everydayness, etc The following are examples of some of the more exceptional uses of the suffix by writers of the 19th century

1804 Coleridge in Lit Rem. (1836) II 414 The exclusive Sir-Thomas Brown-ness of all the fancies. 1853 Geo Eliot in Cross Life (1885) I. 319 Dislike-to-getting-up in the-morningness. 1859 Sala Gas-light & D iv. 43 An irreproachable state of clean-shirtedness, navy blue-broadclothedness and chimney-pot hattedness 1891 Bax Outlooks New Standp iii 199 All nowness is the form of I-ness. Ibid 201 The in-itselfness which Kant saw behind the sense-impression 1893 Morris & Bax Socialism iii. 58 The this-worldliness of barbarian society

3. Uses of the suffix somewhat varying from those mentioned above occur in a few words, such as Forgeness, Milkness, Wilderness, Witness.

9. Never Never (Land or Country), in Australia, the unpopulated northern part of Queensland; the desert country of the interior.

Variously taken as implying that one may never return from it, or will never wish to go back to it. According to F.
